

I am writing to plead with you not to institute measures that would override the restrictions provided to Wisconsin residents by our state's Do-Not-Call list. Enrollment on the Wisconsin list is extremely popular. It is also voluntary and offers a way for people who most emphatically do not wish to receive marketing calls to be relieved from that frequent annoyance. Please tell the banking community for me that if I have done business with them in the past, then I will know how to reach them if I wish to do so again. I expect I can also find contact information for them or their associates in the phone book. I do not maintain phone service (increasingly expensive and convoluted, but that's another issue) in order to make myself a mark. Despite the flagrant commercialization of the public space in recent decades, I do not view myself as a consumer. I am a citizen, and as such I resent the business community's increasingly shameless attempts to conflate the difference between the two. It's time the FCC remembered it too.

Thank you,
